University of Central Lancashire UCLan
Why a handbook?

- Assessment reports frequently highlight an implementation gap

- The knowledge and capacity of adults to respect and promote children’s rights to have their views taken into account matters

- Imperative to build capacity of professionals

- Overcome recurrent barriers:
  - Education and training systems fragmented
  - Curricula are already overcrowded
Aim 1: Encourage professionals everywhere to facilitate meaningful children’s participation

- Hospitals
- Courts
- Alternative care
- Conferences
- Government policy
- Municipalities
- Play and recreation
- Culture and the arts
- At home
- Day care
- International forums
- School
- Local communities
- Government policy
Aim 2: Shifting the paradigm from structures to (also) processes

- Dialogue and learning loops: Listen – Act – Change
- Inclusion: of all children (including amongst others young children, children with disabilities, young Roma and migrant children)
- Impact: on personal and public decision-making
- Children’s growing leadership

2 Developing participatory organizations and environments

Any system can be adapted or changed to create more respectful spaces for children to be able to express their views.

Integrate children’s participation into:
- everyday decision-making
- the functioning and management of organisations
Some suggestions for how

1. Ownership at highest levels
2. Assessment of current situation
3. Organisational policy and procedures
4. Recruit and build staff capacity
5. Establish safe and accessible complaints mechanisms
6. Monitor and reviewing implementation

Children’s Individual Participation

“If you do not take a decision in the best interests of the child, then you are taking a decision against us.”

Best interests of the child

When determining decisions in proceedings affecting children, a number of factors must be taken into account in addition to the child’s wishes and feelings. The best interests of the child are paramount. The state has to do whatever they think is best for the children’s protection, development and well-being. The child’s views on what is ‘best’ is also very important and their views must be taken seriously. Professionals cannot assess the child’s best interests without taking their views into account. In any decision made by adults as to the best interests of the child, the weight given to children’s expressed wishes increases with their age and maturity. The best interests’ principle does not override other rights in the UNCRC and so should not be used to dismiss a child’s views. Judgements have to be made, for example, about whether to exclude a child from a court hearing that they wish to participate in because of concerns about possible harm. Rather, the decision as to whether to grant the child’s wish to attend court should be considered and weighed up in accordance with the child’s age and maturity.
"When I am empowered, if there is an issue, I should take the lead in addressing it."

EXAMPLE

Intergenerational support for activism

In France, in late 2018, some students opposed the government’s recent education reforms of the upper secondary school which orientated students toward specific degrees sooner, and therefore removed the three broad subject choices of science, literature or social sciences. Students also opposed tightening of university entrance procedures which they considered too selective. In response, children, teachers and parents became engaged in activism. A high school student’s union has been in place in France since 1994. This has supported students to demonstrate and stand up for their rights. Alliances of teachers’ unions, parents and lawyers have also organised to show their support for demonstrating students by publishing letters in papers, asking for children to be given the right to strike and demanding protection from retribution, in support of children’s rights to freedom of expression. The French Ministry of Education website provides guidance on high school students’ rights to put up posters, set up groups, meet and publish.
